Introduction
The document contains examples of how people have been developed to support a more integrated approach to care and support. They are grouped into two main areas:
1. examples that cover better ways of working together
2. examples where actual roles to deliver care and support have been developed.

The examples have been collated from:
- New types of worker programme – this programme started in 2003 and captured the learning from a number of pilot sites as they identified new types of workers to deliver services and maintain the partnerships and infrastructure required to deliver high quality support to people who use services and their carers
- Working together – a series of case studies that share valuable lessons and outcomes in workforce development to support key outcomes including reducing avoidable hospital admissions, reablement and timely hospital discharges, smoother transitions and better use of resources
- Skills around the person - this programme has demonstrated time and again the opportunities to harness people’s skills, aptitudes, experiences and passions, and to do so in ways that promote individual aspirations, enhance independence and maximise autonomy
- Working to develop approaches to integration and workers roles – some care pathways such as ones for mental health and reablement have for a number of years provided an integrated way of working and / or developed integrated roles and there is much to learn from these approaches
- Integrated care and support pioneers one year on annual report – Some examples have also been included from the first annual report covering what the Integrated Care and Support Pioneers have achieved.

For each example we have included details of what the project aim was/is, what products and resources are available and who to contact for further information.

The aim is to continually add to this document so that the really exciting and innovative work that is taking place across the country can be shared.

If you would like your own example included in this directory please send details to: karen.stevens@skillsforcare.org.uk

This information was first made available at the Understanding the size and shape of the workforce for integration, a Shaping the workforce offer programme national event, February 2015.
